FINDING THINGS

By GEORGIA HORN.

The one who was initialing a towel agreed emphatically when something was said concerning the general helplessness of men.

"I firmly believe," she remarked, "that if I were to go away and abandon my home, not only friend husband but all the family would starve to death, perish of heat or cold or come to some horrible end, just because nobody in my household ever knows where anything is! If I weren't there to tell 'em, they couldn't locate even the telephone to send for help!

"As for me, I am the finest living example of the human encyclopedia! Long service has trained my brain into noting automatically the exact location of any and all objects. After a woman has grown used to being asked in the middle of July where is the left earmuff worn last December, she develops remarkably along those

"Somehow the family always gets more feeble minded in the summer, just when I want to recuperate and have a good time. They drive me to the edge of insanity when I get them all together at the summer cottage. Christmas with Mr. and Mrs. Haines, It begins early in the morning by my husband's demanding his cap. You would think we were in the arctic respending his X mas vacation with his gions and he expected a frost bite if he ventured out into the perfect July day without it. I tell him he dropped It into the wastebasket when he came home the evening previous. And then my sister walls and wants to know who on earth has taken her tennis racket and buried it!

"While Mary is scrambling for the rolling pin my husband bangs in through the screen door looking around in a vague cort of way in the frightened manner men have when they have lost something.

"'My cap!' he exclaims fretfully. "I took it off a minute while I was spading up that bed and for the life of me-

"'I think I saw it hanging on one of the rosebush stakes,' I tell him, and off he goes tickled to pieces at finding his cherished pet. Then Ethel tears through the house like a young cyclone, disrupting and scattering everything she passes, and talking ten who has abstracted her new book-

"'Ethel,' say I, 'four book is on top of the laundry hamper in the stairway. am sure I don't know how it got there unless you put it there.' Vowing that she has not been within a mile of the hamper for a year, Ethel flies out. Then appears sister. She looks sad. She says that since she afternoon. read that letter from Tom that came in yesterday morning's mail she has not been able to find it, and while, of course, there was nothing specially secret in it-still-she would hate awmean minded enough to pick it up-

"'Your letter,' I recite mechanically to my distracted sister, 'is carefully tucked away in my salad recipe book.

"You are quite a manager, Dot." "I was going to do mother's cupboard, too, but I had to give up my time to the lady agent. She came when I was in the midst of things and at first I felt cross, but when I saw how tired she was I felt sorry for her. Oh, daddy, she was awfully trembly and she had thin, yellowish white hair and she wore horrid black cotton gloves. She said she was a lady agent, but I just knew that any one who wasn't dreadfully poor wouldn't ever wear such ugly gloves. They made me feel sorrier for her than any-

"She said she had walked all day till she was ready to drop and nobody had bought any of the lovely perfume, toilet soap or face powder from her.
